senting an exterior surface which is an arc of a circle, forms two deep grooves, one on each side of the keel. These are expected to supply two columns of water, on which the vessel will doat, giving ner, with her increased creatin of beam, a large advantage in regard to buoyancy, and overcoming in a great degree the tendency to roll in a sea. As the ship would, from the greater breadth and the changed shape of the bottom, foat hearer the top of the water, the displacement and resistance would be much diminished, and a given propelling power would result in greater speed, while it promises also to obviate the necessity for carrying balast whenever the vessel is not freighted. Instead of placing the propeller screw at the stern, close to the rudder, it is proposed to carry it sixty feet forward, its blade striking alternately the two water columns on either side of the keel. This is intended to prevent the screw being thrown out of the water by the forward pitching of the vessel, and to prevent the danger to the propeller from the necessity to shut off steam while the screw is out of the water. It will also save sixty feet of shatting and thereby diminish the danger of the reaking a shaft. This change would also protect the screw from being struck by an enemy's shot and from coming into collision with obstacles to navigation. A second rudder is also provided for by this shifting forward of the screw. This is placed just forward of the screw hould not seen the nature of the screw in the sea, give the new mode, proposes to give our ocean ferries greater buoyanc
